

The elder generation might be wrong

What does it mean to be Danish and does our history affect our view on being Danes? We talked to an elder couple who thought that our history plays a big role in defining what it means to be danish, but that the younger generation doesn't have enough interest in our history. We think that might be wrong.

Back in time danish was just something you were. Now we always have to define what we are, and what it means to be danish. In Denmark we worship our good values and old traditions.

The elder generation doesn't think that the youth has any interest in our old values and history. We focus more on the society today rather than our history on how we got here. The elder generations thinks that to define what is means to be danish, you have to know our past. As we don't have the same need to define "danishness". We define ourselves as danish based on the fact that we live and grew up here.

But is our lack of interest in our historical past just because we are young or is it a generational cliff where we are slowly forgetting our past?
